history of wine in Greece

The Greeks practiced an early form of pigeage when it came to crushing their grapes. Wicker baskets filled with grapes were placed inside wooden or earthenware vats with a rope or plank above. Vineyard workers would hold on to the rope for balance and crush the grapes below with their feet.

Sometimes this would be done to the accompaniment of another worker playing the flute in a festive manner. After crushing, the grapes would be placed in large pithoi jars where fermentation took place.

The writings of Hesiod and Homer's Odyssey includes some of the earliest mentioning of straw wine production, laying freshly harvested grapes out on mats to dry into almost raisins before pressing.

A Lesbian wine known as Protropon was one of the first known wines made exclusively from "free run" juice, taken only from grape clusters pressed by virtue of their own weight.

Other Greek innovations include deliberately harvesting unripe grapes to produce a more acidic wine for blending. The boiling of grape must was discovered as another means of adding sweetness to the wine.

The Greeks believed wine could also be improved by including additives like resin, herbs, spice, seawater, brine, oil and perfume. Retsina, Mulled wine and Vermouth are modern examples of this practice.

*When men drinks, then they are rich
and successful and win lawsuits
and are happy and help their friends. Quiqly, bring me a breaker of wine, so that I may wet my mind
and say something clever*
